and legal hoops appeared on the horizon of a seemingly endless maze that has ensnared the incumbent council and previous office holders. The issues are so politically hot and divisive that several of the council members challenged their own legal counsels' advice this week on several points.

The complexities of dealing with the territory that the city annexed in the early 1990's have been almost as vast as the acreage itself. But within the past year, council has at last reached a consensus that appeared to please everyone involved: Casino Magic, the Bay Louis Community Association, and owners of adjoining single family residential properties.

Last month, the city's lanning and Zoning Planning Commission approved council's idea: Zone the floating casino's marina area for gambling; the immediately adjoining area for "resort" uses associated with the casino; and preclude additional casinos from docking alongside. It was a position outlined by Ward 4 Council man-Tad Black in great detail and accepted by council as a whole after years of acrimony.

The P & Z Commission also agreed with the idea that the waters adjacent to the lands at issue should carry the same type of zoning as the land the water touches -- a move that would carry the Bay St. Louis case all the way to Harrison County and, presumably, keep any gambling barges from docking along the seawall or inland in the area at issue.

Tuesday nights, however, the basic scenario to accomplish those goals hit heavy seas. First, the lawyer that the city has hired to defend the city's plans for future development ran headlong into opposition from council members.

Councilmen Tad Black and James Thriffiley sided with the Bay St. Louis Community Association's contention that the city's foundation for zoning the area -- the Comprehensive Plan -- should be amended. That's what the association has requested in exchange for dropping the association's "bill of exceptions" filed in Circuit Court last year. The amendments would erase a "special use" designation for the annexed area, and impose the specifics of the zoning plan.

While that may seem to be an insignificant distinction to the public at-large, it's a major issue to the Bay St. Louis. Community Association. The group, a watchdog association of local residents opposed to any new casinos in town, insists that the Comprehensive Plan is exact zoning plan for the terri-

Monday night, city special counsel Warren Hengen said the opposite is true: The plan is supposed to be general and flexible; the zoning specific. To do otherwise, he advised, would leave the city open to challenges on down the road from other property owners.

Revamping Comprehensive Plan to accom- residential. Community the modate

In meetings Monday and Association's concerns, he said, would mean the city would have to "start all over again" in devising the preliminary plan. He repeatedly advised council to proceed with zoning the annexed area, and let the association's challenge work its way through court.

Black and Thriffiley insisted, however, the city could lay the controversy to rest by simply changing the Comprehensive Plan's depiction of the area at issue from a "special use" territory to the detailed zoning layout on the table for action.

That, said Thriffiley would "eliminate a crack in the wall" legally. No, Hengen responded, then the city would face possibly endless legal challenges.

In an unusual exchange that followed, the Community Association's attorney, Reilley Morse, was invited to council's table to participate in the debate. "You need to make the Comprehensive Plan congruent with the zoning," said Morse, advising council to "find a way to make it happen" before imposing the zoning.

Thriffiley said he was ready flawed unless it reflects the to amend the plan Tuesday, and zone the area at the same time. "I think that would end it, and I don't think any judge in his right mind would have an objection," he said.

attorney John Scafide said council can't proceed to act until the zoning proposal is "structured as an ordinance." including legal descriptions for each of the three designations at issue, and the "where-as-es and so forth."

Black and Thriffiley appeared confounded at that news, saying Scafide had known for weeks that council was ready to finalize the zoning

Scafide said council has had so many varying versions of the plan and text changes under consideration, he hadn't seen any justification to spend time preparing the final documents.

Black's outline of the zoning boundaries, using streets and linear footage to designate the particulars, isn't legally sufficient and perhaps not even accurate, Scafide warned.

Council President Bill Taylor ioined Thriffiley and Black in expressing frustration at that We're interested in getting this done as soon as possible,' said Taylor, telling Scafide to work on drafting the final ordinance and amending the Comprehensive Plan as well. Scafide promised to have the documents ready by council's next meeting, but questioned whether they could proceed to amend the Comprehensive Plan without another advertised public hearing.

through the construction of an extensive collection system linking Bay St. Louis, Waveland, Hancock County Sewer and Water District, Diamondhead, Port Bienville Industrial Park, Stennis International Airport, Pearlington, and Kiln with the options of adding other customers later.

The plan proposes that these areas fall under the veil of Southern Regional Wastewater Management District in Waveland, as the governing authority for them all, with the treatment plant in Diamondhead acting as a backup, and the possibility of those areas located north of I-10 linking up to the Diamondhead plant, should they decide to participate.

Another key factor in the plan is the possibility of switching to spray fields as a discharge point for treated wastewater, rather than the present system of discharging treated wastewater into area waterways. Court-ordered requirements to set Total Maximum Daily Loads are expected to force the county to reinvent and reassess practices of discharging treated wastewater in county waterways.

The GMP became involved in the county's wastewater treatment dilemma last August, at the invitation of county officials, who were given what was basically a deadline by the Department of Environmental Quality to "get it together" with a cooperative treatment plan for the entire county. At that time, DEQ officials said they had been getting mixed signals and contradictory plans from local agencies concerning the issue. At the same time, many facilities were realizing that with expanded growth and new TMDL standards, present systems were reaching capacity and would require upgrades. Communities were also facing extensive renovations to the sanitary sewage collection systems which were proving inadequate during periods of heavy rains and usage. Questions were also raised about the possibility that unsewered homes with private septic systems (particularly in the northern portion of Hancock County) were contributing to high concentrations of fecal coliforms in surrounding surface water. Since that time, the county has been working diligently with the GMP, at regular workshops, to develop a plan which would encompass a 20-year projection of estimated growth in the county. USR Corporation was contracted to assist the GMP to evaluate a range of conceptual options and provide recommendations for the most cost-effective and environmentally-beneficial solutions to wastewater collection and treatment.

Three basic scenarios were considered for the project: Individual systems; a new centralized plant; or a system linked to the present treatment plant in Waveland, with Southern Regional Wastewater Management District as the if this water is supposed to be governing authority. At present, all of the districts except Diamondhead have expressed their approval for the linked enough for use in these other system, one that would save the county roughly half the cost of operating and maintaining separate facilities and loan repayments.

Should Diamondhead choose not to participate, the cost-permonth for the county would be $270,000 a month for operations, maintenance and loan repayment,, spread among a present population of 42,000 in the county. If Diamondhead does participate, the costs would drop to $229,000 per month, a large savings for the county and a safety net for Diamondhead, whose approximately 7,000 residents would become responsible for all future upgrades to meet new federal and state guidelines if they remain a separate entity.

based on the assumption that 100 per cent of the funding would come from 20 yr. SRF loans. Costs could drop substantially with the receipt of state or federal grant funds. The beauty of the linked system is that it spreads all costs across a large population base, thus reducing the burden on individual communities for startup costs, said Griffith. It also frees up funds in other communities for upgrades to outdated sanitary sewage collecton systems. The need for individual treatment system permits is also eliminated, thus freeing individual communities from this liability, said Griffith. And most exciting of all, it allows the entire county to come together to address the goal of getting all treated effluent out of our waterways, Griffith said.

Possibilities for land-based discharge of treated effluent are irrigation for timber, sod or hay farms, or wetlands restoration, among others. It will require a change in the way we look at things, said Griffith, but clean enough for us to swim in, then it is reasonable to think that it could be cleaned up industries. Griffith said irrigation of timber, sod and hay farms with treated effluent could make these industries virtually drought-proof.

Griffith also said that switching to a land-based discharge system will benefit the entire county by improving the oyster industry and at the same time improving our appeal as a destination for water recreation such as boating, fishing and swimming.

Planners estimate that the Pearlington area should come on-line in the next one-to-two years, with the Kiln area following close behind. If Diamondhead decides not to join the county, then Kiln would be linked directly with the plant at Southern Regional in Waveland.

The Krewe of Nereids treated their guests to a wild ride Saturday evening during their 35th annual ball titled "All Aboard the Orient Express."

All were delighted as the krewe members danced their way through a grand tour of Europe's most beautiful cities on one of the world's most exotic train trips.
